Man is indebted to society in various ways - he is brought up by his parents and his relatives, educated at the expenses of others, the roads he walks on were not constructed by himself or his family, and so on. Thus, our whole life is dependent on others. We only repay a part of the debt we owe to others by our humble service. True service is, therefore, rendered only in humility. There is no room for pride in service. In fact, when the whole world is powerless entirely to mitigate the sorrow of a single individual, how much less can a single individual mitigate the entire sorrow of the world! Indeed, service purifies one's own heart even more than it does lasting good to another. The honest server should feel indebted to the served.
